By evaporating liquid hydrogen under diminished pressure, a temperature of 13° absolute or 470° F. of frost was attained. At this temperature hydrogen became a frozen foam-like mass, air a rigid inert solid; only helium of known gases remained uncondensed. Pure metals cooled to this temperature became almost perfect conductors of electricity. By the use of charcoal as an absorbing agent for gases at low temperature the highest vacuum can be rapidly obtained, and gases like hydrogen, helium, and neon separated from air. Problems of capillarity; soap films of the greatest tenuity like the black of Newton's rings, which is about a hundred-thousandth of a millionetre thick, were shown to be exceedingly stable and long-lived, when made in a cryophorus vacuum; soap bubbles when blown in perfectly pure air can be preserved for a period of two months or more, and can reach a thinness when the bubbles are uniformly black, having lost all colour; photographs taken in natural colours of bubbles, 4½ cent. diameter (17 inches), in various stages of development, were exhibited at the Royal Society, 22 June 1916; a gold loving cup was presented to Sir James and Lady Dewar on their golden wedding by the Members of the Royal Institution, 17 June 1921. Publications: Collected Papers on Spectroscopy (with G.
